Unfortunately, children are still suffering from the trauma of neglect, rejection, abandonment, and abuse—but it is being inflicted at a greater level of intensity. Our children need and deserve a greater level of trauma-informed care, that is responsive in both word and deed. To achieve this, adults need to be armed with greater tools and empowered to infuse them in every aspect of engagement with children.

This trauma-informed specialist certification is grounded in transformative learning theory which will allow participants to construct new meaning from the traumatic experiences of the children and youth they work with. This reinterpretation will encourage task-oriented problem-solving on ways to foster healing and transformation for children.

The level of engagement and rigor of the course require a high level of commitment that is different from what many caregivers are accustomed to when completing their annual hours. Therefore, Students are selected for the course after completing an application process and attending orientation. The certification has two levels: Trauma Specialist I and Trauma Specialist II. Those selected for the course will participate in an 18-hour module to become Specialist I. They may enroll in the additional 12-hour module to become Specialist II. Classes are held in either two-hour or three-hour increments, depending upon the host site. Students will have weekly graded assignments, a mid-term assessment, and a final project at the end of each module. Caregivers who do not wish to complete the certification process, can enroll through FKCE, if the college is the host site, to attend the individual weekly classes, and receive credit for RFA renewal hours.

The instructor, Theresa Reed, is a former foster youth, a Foster/Kinship Care Education (FKCE) program director, and the author of the It's Not Drama, It's Trauma book series.
